BACKGROUND

The EU is Africa's most important investor and trading partner but, in the sixty years of the post-colonial period, the role of Africa mainly as an exporter of commodities to the EU has remained constant. Unsurprisingly, the EU's trade regulations and underlying incentives are repeatedly subject of criticism.

The termination of the trade-related provisions of the Cotonou Partnership Agreement (CPA) since 2008, which regulated the EU's trade relations with most African countries, combined with the lack of progress in the negotiations on the Economic Partnership Agreements (EPAs) has led to further uncertainty. In addition, there are new trade-related challenges, including the ongoing digitalisation of trade and production processes, green growth and the recovery from the COVID-19 pandemic.

One key to Africa's economic development is the strengthening of intra-African trade. Great hopes are therefore placed in the African Continental Free Trade Area (AfCFTA), which is to come into force at the beginning of 2021. It is also considered to be of great importance in overcoming the economic consequences of COVID-19.

But how do the EU's trade policy approaches affect African efforts to deepen trade cooperation and to create regional value chains? From the perspective of African experts, how should the EU adjust its policy in order to promote the continent's independent economic development? And from a European perspective: How does the entry into force of the AfCFTA change the European trade strategy towards Africa?

The sef: Policy Lunch will discuss how the existing trade relations can be made less asymmetric and more viable so that they enable sustainable development and also promote rather than hinder intra-African trade.
